AGE NO BAR TO DEGREES

Columbia Extension Students Up to 70 Getting College Educations

A survey of 7,133 students of the extension department of Columbia University conducted by Prof. John A. Northcott reveals that a college education can be obtained by those taking extension courses instead of the regular university course. Dr. Katherine Campbell Reiley, assistant professor of Greek and Latin, stated yesterday.

It was revealed, she said, that students of sixty-six and seventy years can do university work through extension courses. Four women and one man registering for such courses gave their ages as between those figures, nine women and six men fall between the ages of sixty-five and seventy, and 145 are listed between forty-six and fifty.
